Ascending the majestic, snow sprinkled mountains of Colorado was Jennifer Rose's passion--until her parents chased her from the state. The pair's drug addicted irresponsibility drives Jen to California, where she constructs a fresh life with a man she claims to love. Neglecting her family, she convinces herself that she can survive without them. After seven years of living in Los Angeles, Jennifer returns with her fiancé to deliver the news of their engagement. But her brief stay is extended once she discovers her beloved sister has been struck with cancer. The surrounding aura of death provides Jen with the drive to revitalize her own stale life, rousing her craving to climb. Meeting Trace, a fellow self-reliant adventurer, tests more than Jennifer's physical stability. Struggling with financial affairs, Trace attempts to pay off his debt by entering the county's annual mountaineering competition. But when circumstance restricts him from competing, Jennifer volunteers to take his place. Together, Jennifer and Trace discover the importance of unity and just how far independence can stretch.
